survival after death."[91] It seems clear from Smith's account that the Kagoro obwai cult " does not command awe among initiated males " at the present time, but he leaves some doubt as to the effectiveness of the cult among the uninitiated, particularly the women, commenting only that it " has lost some of its functions."[92] Apart from spring memorial rites the ancestral cult appears to be associated with none of the rituals of the annual cycle—planting, harvesting, or hunting.[93]

The extent to which belief in the supernatural constitutes a basis for, or at least an element of, the aforementioned rituals of the annual cycle is by no means clear from Smith's accounts of them, already referred to.[94] Tremearne, too, fails to make the point clear in describing " harvest rites."

Of hunting rites Temple says only that ancestral spirits are consulted in the sacred grove. Akanyam, described by Smith as ritualized beer drinking by members of a lineage at the lineage shrine (sshwo), appears to be associated primarily with hunting, but it is not clear whether this rite follows each hunt, or simply terminates the hunting (=dry) season. Neither is the religious, as contrasted with the social, basis of the rite entirely clear, though Smith calls it a " ritual of purification," and says that it marks the end of the period during which the hunter is in danger from his quarry's dead spirit.[95]

Judging from Meek's evidence, the kwai (clans) are totemic units, that is, respect particular animal species: he reports, however, that clans recognizing a common origin (that is, localized segments of a bin) sometimes do, and sometimes do not, recognize the same species as their emblem.

Smith gives an interesting account of the imbhweh cult, which during its brief career rivalled the obwai cult, and threatened to displace the budding chieftaincy as a comprehensive institution, so that (in 1934) the Administration felt bound to outlaw it. In general outline imbhweh closely resembles obwai; it was essentially a male secret society with masked dancers and initiation, and it imposed a certain discipline on the community through floggings and ritualistic fines of goats and beer. According to Smith, the rise of imbhweh was incident to the disastrous locust invasion and subsequent famine of c. 1930, and to the activities of a new chief appointed about this time, a ruthless man, who converted the N.A. police into a personal instrument and had people whipped, fined, or imprisoned at will. Imbhweh's chief claim was to the control of locusts; accordingly the shrine and ritual of the cult was established in each village, under the headship of the tiu imbhweh. Everyone was required to attend the nightly dances at the shrine, to bring beer, goats, chickens, and dogs as tribute. Women were ordered to sleep with nominees, and premarital licence, a thing foreign to Kagoro custom, was ordered. Imbhweh was also instrumental in punishing theft, which had increased during the period of locust infestation. According to Smith, the great mass of the people were caught between these two opposing forces struggling for power, [91] How this accords with Smith's assertion that " in former days . . . ritual assistance . . . was sought from [their father and father's brother] either in their lifetime by small gifts of beer or after their death," is not clear, unless it be that a generation of successful mission activity has wrought changes in Kagoro religious belief.

[92] Smith implies that even the residual core of belief in agwam obwai as a kind of go-between from the living to the dead, described by Meek, has vanished.

[93] These spring memorial rites are described only imperfectly by Smith, but occur towards the end of the dry season. They begin with obwai abeyan, then comes fon which seems to be a kind of memorial service for the dead of the preceding year.

[94] Smith lumps together all planting and harvest rituals as ci (chi) rituals; each of several traditional staples has its own special rites. These rituals appear to define the village, and are presided over by the village tiawhop, always a member of an Ankwei clan. (Whether lesser rites are subsequently held by each clan is not clear: Smith never describes the exact functions of the siawhop, the clan-head in ritual matters.) Hunting rites are presided over by the tenci of each clan: within the village, the rites of the senior clan take precedence over those of all other clans.

[95] Tremearne's (and Temple's) statement that the spirit of a hunter's quarry may be reborn in his child is perhaps relevant here.
